Oh, Mifanwy will brighten you up; she is the merriest little soul in the world when you get her to yourself. Manys the good larf weve had together, aint we, Mifanwy Yes, indeed, she answered, we have. Mrs. Roose smiled indulgently at Mifanwy, whose heart went out at once to the quiet, sad-looking woman. At eight oclock the cab came to the door, and the visitors left with many hearty good-byes. Tom and Mrs. Pomfrey drove silently home, while Rhys Morgan made his way fully content to his own lodgings. From this time forth began for Mifanwy the real business of life: the deep-seated thirst for knowledge, and the means of satisfying that thirst; but, above all, the entrancing delight she found in the culture of her voice. Music was her absorbing passion, and she left no stone unturned to make herself proficient in it. She attended a class for French and Italian, and soon astonished her teachers by the ease with which she acquired those languages. It is a curious fact that a Welshman learns a foreign language with great ease. Had her teachers known the strong motive that compelled the girl to exert all her energies for her own advancement, they would not perhaps have been so surprised at her rapid progress. Rhys Morgan took her English education into his own hands, and it was a delightful hour to him when, the teathings cleared away, and Mrs. Roose sitting down to her knitting,...
