This published publication is wonderful. Of course, it is actually engage in, still an interesting and amazing literature. It is extremely difficult to leave it before concluding, once you begin to read the book.

Richards¹: Dr. Mathews speaks, in his concluding paragraph, of the saving of the rarer elements made practicable by using the electric furnace. A very good illustration of this is seen in making armor plate. About 50 percent of the steel cast from the furnace gets into the finished armor plate and about 50 percent is scrap, which has to go back to the furnace to be remelted. In this remelting all the chromium in the metal is lost; and this is not only a loss of chromium, but it makes a slag that is very pasty, infusible and hard to handle, so that you have difficulty with the slag because of its content of chromium oxide. If the armor-plate scrap were remelted in electric furnaces, the whole of the chromium would be saved and the metallurgical difficulties with the slag would be obviated. I believe they have started to do that in England, and it has been suggested to the Government here; I placed its advantages before our Navy Department, but no steps have yet been taken to make the change. ¹ Professor of Metallurgy, Lehigh University. I do not agree entirely with the statement of Dr. Mathews that the electric furnace requires very expert handling. Perhaps he said for the obtaining of the best results, but it is certain that satisfactory commercial results with electric furnaces are obtained without any better or more expert workmen than are used on open-hearth furnaces. I...
